Erne, like Britton, was a very clever boxer. He was lightweight champion of the world, and felt confident he could outbox and outfight Terry McGovern, featherweight champion. Terry's manager challenged Erne, and the match was nade, Erne agreeing to weigh in at a se weight half way between his own, 133 pounds, and the 122 at which McGovern held his champion ship bonors. It was agreed the light weight title should not be at stake because Erne was making such a low

But he stuck to it, worked, cut down his food, denied himself liquids even when he was tortured with thirst. As a result he became feverish and suddealy began to drop weight. He fell down to 123 pounds, and on the day of the fight was only a pound or so above that figure. And at 133 he was drawn fine! Result, he made the rushing Terry look foolish for a round, then wilted completely and was knocked out.

Although lighter than McCoorty, Lee Darcy was a great favorite in Australia before the battle owing to the way he whipped Jeff Smith a few weeks ago. In that fight Darcy had Smith in such trouble in the fifth round that Jeff swung wildly and struck several low blows. He was disqualified and the Australian promoters agreed to bar him from the Australian ring, claiming that the fouls were intentionally delivered when Smith felt himself going down to defeat.

It's likely Darcy will stay in Australia for a time. He will make a lot of money there, being recognized as world's middleweight champion. He than the ten-round no-decision af-fairs in this country.
